

How Do Harari's Proposed Solutions to 21st-Century Problems Align with the Globalist Agenda?

Sixbert SANGWA • November 03, 2024

In a world increasingly defined by rapid technological advances, global shifts, and existential crises, many voices have emerged to offer solutions for the challenges of the 21st century. Among them, Yuval Noah Harari has become a prominent figure, particularly through his book 21 Lessons for the 21st Century. Harari, an influential historian and philosopher, outlines various challenges humanity faces and proposes solutions to these pressing issues. However, within his proposals, some see the shaping of a new paradigm—one that aligns closely with the concepts of a New World Order (NWO) and even the emergence of a future global governance that Christian eschatology identifies as the reign of the Antichrist.

Simultaneously, global organizations like the United Nations (UN) appear to be taking concrete steps toward global governance through initiatives like the Pact for the Future, which aims to address global challenges with a coordinated, centralized response. As highlighted in the September 2023 speech by Antonio Guterres, UN Secretary-General, the focus is on building platforms that can automatically respond to global crises, advocating for "greater Global solidarity" and "better management of critical issues of global concern." Guterres's language about a "new era" reflects a deeper agenda, often interpreted as a nod towards a New World Order. This article aims to explore how Harari's ideas, the UN's actions, and the broader trajectory of global politics are converging, and how they may align with Biblical prophecies concerning the end times.

Harari's Vision for the 21st Century: A Prelude to Centralized Control?

In 21 Lessons for the 21st Century, Harari identifies significant challenges ranging from technological disruptions, climate change, and terrorism to the impact of AI on the job market and the rise of populism. Here is a concise overview of his suggested solutions and their implications:

- Technological Disruption: Harari stresses the need to manage the impact of artificial intelligence (AI) and biotechnology. He suggests global regulations to ensure ethical use of such technologies. However, these proposed regulations often hint at centralized control, as they necessitate a global governing body with the power to enforce compliance across borders.
- Post-Truth and Media Manipulation: Addressing misinformation, Harari emphasizes the importance of education reform and media regulation to combat "fake news." While this seems reasonable, the regulation of media often becomes a tool for controlling narratives, limiting freedom of speech and labeling dissent as misinformation, thereby stifling alternative perspectives.
- Global Cooperation on Climate Change: Harari supports global initiatives to address climate change, advocating for a collective effort to transition to green energy. This aligns with the UN's emphasis on sustainable development. However, it also sets the stage for global institutions to dictate policies to nations, centralizing power under the guise of ecological responsibility.
- Economic Inequality and Universal Basic Income (UBI): To counter economic disparities, Harari suggests concepts like UBI, where every citizen receives a regular, unconditional payment. While UBI can address immediate needs, it could also create a populace dependent on centralized structures for basic sustenance, paving the way for a system where compliance with global norms becomes tied to economic survival.
- Global Governance and the Future of Democracy: Harari envisions a future where global challenges—such as pandemics, climate change, and nuclear proliferation—are addressed through global governance structures. This resonates with Antonio Guterres's call for "upgraded United Nations" to meet the "challenges of a new era." In this vision, traditional nation-state sovereignty is diminished, and power becomes increasingly centralized at a global level.

Harari's views are reflective of broader elite agendas, emphasizing the necessity of global cooperation to solve global problems. Yet, this perspective aligns closely with the Biblical warnings about a coming system of global control, where nations submit to a centralized authority. As Revelation 13:7-8 indicates, the Antichrist will hold power over every tribe, people, language, and nation, commanding widespread allegiance.

The Pact for the Future: A Blueprint for the New World Order?

The UN's Pact for the Future, adopted in September 2023, is a framework designed to tackle the complexities of contemporary global challenges. This pact advocates for the creation of "emergency platforms that swing into action automatically" to handle crises. Guterres emphasized the need for these platforms during his address, stating, "We cannot walk into the next global pandemic or shock without being better prepared... we need greater global solidarity today and with future generations." This statement suggests a vision of global management that transcends the authority of individual nations.

The concept of "global solidarity" and the need for an "upgraded United Nations" aligns with the agenda of consolidating power in response to crises. While the language speaks of preparedness and unity, the underlying implication is a shift toward a governance structure where national sovereignty gives way to a coordinated global system. This has led many to see it as a precursor to a New World Order—a term often used to describe a centralized global government, with the potential to fulfill prophetic descriptions of the Antichrist's global reign.

Harari's vision and the UN's Pact for the Future find common ground in their advocacy for global problem-solving mechanisms. They propose centralization as the path to stability and survival, yet such centralization is precisely what Christian eschatology warns against. Revelation 17:12-13 speaks of a time when ten kings give their power and authority to a central figure, signaling a global shift towards a unified rule.

Preparing for the Next Pandemic: Control Through Fear?

The preparation for future pandemics is a significant theme in the discourse surrounding global governance. Guterres's statement that the world must be prepared for the next pandemic echoes sentiments in Bill Gates's 2022 book, How to Prevent the Next Pandemic, where he argues that pandemics are inevitable and that global coordination is essential to mitigate their impact. Such rhetoric raises questions about whether the fear of future crises is being used to justify the creation of centralized control mechanisms.

This perspective finds support in various critiques that explore the role of influential figures and organizations in shaping narratives around global health crises. These critiques suggest that such narratives are designed to pave the way for a global system of control. By emphasizing the inevitability of future pandemics, leaders can justify the establishment of global protocols that concentrate power in the hands of a few. The UN's approach has set the stage where any potential outbreak could trigger a global system to take control, effectively bypassing national sovereignty in the name of crisis management. This aligns with the prophetic warning in Revelation 13:16-17, which describes a system where economic control is exercised over those who conform to it.

Digital Currency and Surveillance: A Tool for Control?

A crucial aspect of this centralization is the push for digital currencies. Harari and many global leaders view these as a means to modernize the global financial system. This shift to digital money aligns with global governance objectives, enabling unprecedented tracking and control of financial transactions. In our previous article, we explore how digital currencies could be used to restrict economic freedoms, particularly in a system that can monitor and limit transactions based on conformity to global norms.

Revelation 13:16–17, which describes a time when people will be unable to buy or sell without the "mark," bears an unsettling resemblance to a digital currency system where compliance could become a prerequisite for economic participation.

Conclusion:

Yuval Noah Harari's proposals, the Pact for the Future, and Antonio Guterres's speeches all point toward a world where global crises demand global solutions. However, it's crucial to recognize that often these so-called global challenges are human-engineered or explained through invented narratives to justify centralized control. While many of their suggestions seem driven by noble intentions, such as addressing climate change or preparing for future pandemics, the mechanisms they propose often entail a significant shift toward centralized authority. For Christians, this trajectory is not just a political shift but a potential fulfillment of Biblical prophecy concerning the end times.

The centralization of authority, the potential for economic control through digital currencies, and the establishment of global governance structures echo the warning in 2 Thessalonians 2:3-4, which speaks of a "man of lawlessness" who will exalt himself over all forms of authority. As believers, it is crucial to remain vigilant, discerning the signs of the times and standing firm in the truth of Scripture, for the light of God's Word is our guide through the darkness of deception.

Understanding these developments is not about succumbing to fear but about being prepared and equipped with Biblical wisdom. We must critically examine the narratives surrounding global challenges, recognizing that they may be manipulated to serve agendas of control. As we await the return of Christ, our true hope and the ultimate answer to the trials of this age, we should remain discerning and rooted in God's truth.
